THE GAZETTE.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 31.

A SCENE was witnessed recently on the Rappahannock, which, doubtless, is often to be repeated in Virginia. One hundred and fifty negroes, male and female, old and young, were brought back to their old homes along the river, from which they had either been taken by the Federals, or else had gone in search of liberty and happiness during the war. Whether they obtained either or both of the latter much to be desired acquisitions by their flight or forcible emigration is greatly to be questioned. From the exclamations joy, their evident happiness at returning to their homes, the homes of their servitude, the community of their former masters, we are inclined to think they did not. The Baltimore boat brought them and their luggage, larger than that of a Confederate Division, and transportation was furnished them by the United States Government. It seems that they had been working a United States farm up the Patuxent river in Prince George's county, Maryland. The farm belonged to a Mr. Forrest, but owing to a little difficulty Mr. Forrest had not occupied it for some time past. The President, not liking this style of things and anxious in the words of the hymn to "let a pardoned rebel live," restored Mr. Forrest to his own, and the Freedman's Bureau having no further use for the negroes, especially as winter was coming on, sent them back to their old homes for their impover hed former owners to take care of. They were landed along the river at different point: some eighty or ninety being put off at Tappahaono k.
